

Shards in the Frame

A mosaic is rarely a single story. It combines several personalities , emotions and characters to unanimously present a beautiful piece of art, which is beyond admiration. In the collection of Pixar Animation Studios works we witness a movie , namely “Inside Out” , which deals with the human mind and its complexities , where several human emotions are put together so that a person can experience different moments of life. But only if one emotion has the control then the person goes into a monotonous shade of existence, stripped off the vibrant experiences of a human life.

When we zoom out ,we look at how different characters , some not bound by time and of not the same era with different roles, form a team to perform a single task. It’s none other than our Avengers, a team composed of literal god (Thor), a billionaire in a tin suit (Iron Man), and a man out of time (Captain America), clashing with one another's EGO but unify for a cause , to save New York City from Loki .They don't become a single entity, they remain individuals who learn to cover each other's blind spots.

If we zoom in and look at a single individual, Kevin Wendell Crumb from 'Split', who is suffering from dissociative identity disorder and has 23 alter egos. This showcases the compound and multiplex state of his mind , the "shattered" identity. However, the personalities do come together for a cause “The Beast”. It’s a fascinating look at how "fragments" can create a powerful , if terrifying - new whole.

This proves that mosaic isn’t just about different entities coming together for the bigger picture but retaining their individuality while working towards the same goal , regardless of the motive one holds.
