

Shards in the Frame

A mosaic is rarely a single story. It combines several personalities , emotions and characters to unanimously present a beautiful piece of art, which is beyond admiration. In the collection of Pixar Animation Studios works we witness a movie , “Inside Out” , which deals with the human mind and its complexities , where several human emotions are put together in the inner sanctum of the mind so that a person can experience different moments of life. But only if one emotion has the control then the person goes into a monotonous shade of existence, stripped off the vibrant experiences of a human life. A life can’t always go in a straight road without any humps or bumps , cause life ain’t that easy to start with. There are ups and downs in life where you experience so many different things like sadness, fear, guilt, thrill, excitement, joy, but also love, these individual experiences are what go down in the memory book as a collage or should I say mosaic.

When we zoom out and look at how different characters , some not bound by time and not even the same era with different roles, form a team to protect something they treasure. It’s none other than earth's mighty superheroes, Avengers a team composed of literal god (Thor), a billionaire in a tin suit (Iron Man), an enormous green rage monster (Hulk) and a man out of time (Captain America), clashing with one another's EGO but unify for a cause , to save New York City from the greatest trickster, Loki. They start out as chaos , with an old man and a rich guy just bugging each other as the angry green fellow tries to calm them down, what an irony. Yet they learn to work as a whole. They don't become a single entity, they remain individuals who learn to cover each other's blind spots.

If we zoom in and look at a single individual person, Kevin Wendell Crumb from 'Split', who is suffering from dissociative identity disorder with 23 alter egos. This showcases the compound and multiplex state of his mind , the "shattered" identity. Each of them completing for the control over the body to achieve what is best for Kevin in their own way. All of them are completely different , one is a russian body builder while the other a kid who is 10, yet the body is the same. One has capabilities to lift heavy pounds while the other can't even lift a chair. However, after all their differences they also have one thing in common , to protect Kevin.

The personalities do come together for a cause “The Beast”. A vicious creature shaped by the stories he heard in his traumatic childhood, which manifests as a primal, physical evolution of his collective trauma . It is a haunting reminder that "shattered fragments" can create a powerful , if terrifying - new whole.

From a wonderful headquarter of a child’s mind to the distorted figure of a man’s fractured personas, the mosaic reveals the truth: being a whole does not require uniformity. A mosaic isn’t just a beautiful picture, it's evidence to the fact that when mismatched shards and rough edges are placed together, it creates a masterpiece of complexity.
